

REVELATIONS OF GLAAKI
(Holographic Notebook)

We seek to preserve the thoughts of god.

The pages of this old notebook are covered with archaic handwriting. Although the specific hand often seems to shift from one page to the next – or even from one word to the next in the middle of sentences – there nonetheless seems to be a commonality to the disparate styles.

In similar fashion, the text itself is fragmented. The thoughts of the writers skip freely from one subject to another, like a skiff lost in a storm. In the middle of a particular piece of argument or exposition, the entire matter will be dropped entirely (often in the middle of a sentence) and some other curiosity will be taken up. In some cases, the original thought will be returned to several paragraphs (or pages) later, although oddly it is just as likely to be taken up by another of the writers entirely.

From the stars he came, of iridescent, living metal.

Glaaki. Glakki. Glaaki.

Chant his name, for he has angled the world unto his will.

The conceit of the writers is that they are “scribing the thoughts” of Glaaki, which appears to be the name they’ve assigned to God. They “share his thoughts” and in their moments of rest choose to share the truths which they have gleaned.

By the turgid thrust of his spine will he transform you. He will leave his witch's mark upon you. He will take your thoughts into yourself and you shall feel the dreams become one with your own thoughts.

The text also speaks of “a time before the time we know”:

And in that time, Glaaki came to us during the lifetimes of his chosen first, and after that time he served the priests the properties of silver shall be most useful in the construction of the upper apparatus, which shall measure eight upon the side and seven upon...

As one example of how the text can rapidly shift. However, the writer seems to return to the topic a few paragraphs later:

In darkness was he clothed and so the priests of Karnak in their war against the Render of Veils and he was among them for the passing of many years before his chosen first returned to the moment of his arrival. And now, upon this second first, a great city now was reared in the fabric where the flesh of Yog-Sothoth had grown thin and the substance of the world was taut with his presence.
