

Savitree,

We have concluded our survey of the Isle Beyond Severnford. The iconography at the site is consistent with those from the Karnak artifacts, but we've dated it as being less than 400 years old. The exact date is hard to pin down, but it's certainly more recent than the construction of the temple itself (which is definitely consistent with 1st or 2nd century Roman construction, which would match the references in Tacitus.)

We've also completed a full magnetic survey of the island. The signatures are remarkable, but are definitely not consistent with the Liar.

Having actually examined the stone here, there are some references in the REVELATIONS that I now think might have a correlation to this site. I'll have to consult your copy when I return to Bangkok. But, conversely, I don't think this site can tell us anything about the origins of the REVELATIONS, either.

As per our original site plan, we're going to proceed to Deepfall Lake. There are a few other avenues of interest which have cropped up here, however. Depending on how things go at the lake, we may remain here in England for an extra week.
